them an advantage over their predators, who often overheat. Camels have a heat-exchange system in their nasal cavity, which reduces the amount of water lost in their breath. Hot, dry air is inhaled and mixes with moisture inside the nose before traveling to the lungs. The exhaled air is much cooler than the air outside, so the moisture it carries condenses in the nose. This creates the cool, damp conditions needed to chill the next in-breath.