certain dominant competitors are displaced by predators and, in their new habitats, outcompete sessile animals for food. Small fish that are displaced, for example, could outcompete sponges for food.

A green darner dragonfly laying its eggs in a pond. The larvae that hatch out are predators and have been shown to influence the behavior of their tadpole prey.