

Mangrove-fringed islands in the Florida Keys—now protected for their diverse range of marine and terrestrial life—were the focus of research to test the island biogeography theory.