their particular environment. The driving force is natural selection because the environment favors individuals with certain genes—some genes are “better” for certain situations and not for others—which are then passed on to offspring. Because the behavior of animals is influenced by genes, behavior must be influenced by natural selection as well.