Citizen science is research and observation carried out by nonprofessional individuals, teams, or networks of volunteers, often in partnership with professional scientists. It is based on an appreciation that the scientific community should be responsive to the environmental concerns of society as a whole, and an understanding that citizens can produce reliable scientific evidence that leads to greater scientific knowledge. The involvement of ordinary people allows research bodies to accomplish projects that would be far too expensive or time-consuming to run otherwise.