North American migration pathways

Migratory birds in North America use paths that can be divided into four north–south zones, called flyways—Pacific, Central, Mississippi, and Atlantic. Citizen scientists can play a key role in recording the birds as they stop to feed or rest along the way, during their flights north in spring and south in fall.

“Butterflies—millions upon millions … carpeted the ground in their flaming myriads on this Mexican mountainside.”

Fred Urquhart
