

The short-beaked echidna is one of the most widespread native mammals in the Australasian ecozone. They live in a range of habitats from desert to rain forest.

See also: The distribution of species over space and time • Climax community • Open community theory • Biogeography