

Acid rain had been wearing away stonework—such as this statue in the churchyard of St. Peter and St. Paul, Krakow, Poland—for hundreds of years before the phenomenon was understood.