

Read accessible description

A sustainable harvest

The Newfoundland problem demonstrates the complexities of fishery management, which often relies on the concept of maximum sustainable yield: the volume of fish harvested from the sea should be equal to the volume replenished through reproduction. This is usually achieved through quotas, which limit the number of fish that can be brought in during a season. Quotas can curb unsustainable fishing: for example, 16 percent of