

There is constant competition for food and resources; better-adapted species outcompete those less suited to the environment.

Reducing competition increases the chances of survival.

Finding a unique niche is the circumstance that removes competition.

The existence of each species is determined by a slender thread of circumstances.

BACK TO ARTICLE