In every region, plants grow and develop through a series of successions.

At each stage, they become bigger, more complex, and interconnected.

Eventually the vegetation takes on the most complicated interconnected form the climate will allow.

Once a community reaches this “climax”, vegetation stops changing.

BACK TO ARTICLE