company as the banks were owned by the GoI—this was an indirect route to nationalise private firms. Such a compulsion which hampered the growth and development of the Indian industries was withdrawn by the government in 1991.[35]

The picture presented by the New Industrial policy of 1991 was taken by many experts, the opposition in the parliament and even the public figures as well as the business and industry of the country as a 'rolling back' of the state. The glorious role given to the state by the Nehruvian economy seemed completely toppled down. Any one idea the new policy challenged was an emphatic good bye to the 'control regime' perpetuated till now by the government. There was a coalition of interests of politicians, bureaucrats, multinationals as well as the domestic industrial and business houses whose interests the control regime sheltered and served.[36] Thus, a memorandum to the Government requesting not to dismantle the control regime by the major industrial houses of India as well as arrival of the 'Swadeshi Jagaran Manch' were not illogical. But the governments continued with the reform programme with politically permissible pace and a time came when the same industrial houses requested the Government (2002) to expedite the process of reform! Now the Indian industry and business class has been able to understand the economics of 'openness' and a different kind of the mixed economy. But the process of reforms have still to go miles before its real benefits start reaching the masses and development together with reform could be made a mass movement.

This is why the experts have suggested that only assuming that reforms will benefit the masses will not be enough to make it politically happen, but the governments, the administrative agencies and the economists all need to link it positively to mass welfare—it might require to create a popular climate and form the political coalitions in favour of the argument that privatisation and accordingly restructured labour laws are basically aimed at creating jobs, better job prospects, alleviating poverty, enriching education and providing healthcare to the masses[37]. In the coming times, the Government went from one to another generations of the reforms setting new targets and every time trying to make reforms sociopolitically possible.

Reforms with the human face' was one such attempt of the United Progressive Alliance in 2003 when it formed the government at the Centre.
