5. Act to constrain actors who subscribe to supranational organizing principles.
6. Permit defeated or constrained essential national actors to re-enter the system as acceptable role partners or act to bring some previously inessential actor within the essential actor classification.
7. Treat all essential actors as acceptable role partners.

Characteristics of Balance of Power System

Professor Palmer and Perkins have enumerated certain basic characteristics of balance of power system:

- The term 'balance of power' itself suggests equilibrium but it is subjected to constant changes, i.e., from equilibrium to disequilibrium.
- Nicholas J. Spykman (1942) remarked that balance of power is not "a gift of the gods" and it must be achieved by "the active intervention of man". States cannot wait until it 'happens' if they are willing to survive, and as Spykman says, that "they must be willing to go to war to preserve a balance against the growing hegemonic power of the period.
- Balance of power tends to be in favour of status quo; but to be effective, a balance of power policy must be changing and should be a dynamic one.
- A real balance of power rarely exists and its real test, presumably, is war. When war actually breaks, the whole system gets upset.
- It offers both subjective approach of a statesman and an objective approach of a historian. As was observed by Martin Wight (1946) who suggested that the difference in the perspectives of a historian and a statesman is that "The historian will say that there is a balance when the opposing groups seem to him to be equal in power. The statesman will say that there is a balance when he thinks that his side is stronger than the other. And he will say that his country holds the balance, when it has freedom to join one side or the other
