Policy, 1971) considers foreign policy as a “bridging discipline” that “takes as its focus of study the bridges that whole systems called nation-states build to link themselves and their subsystems to even more encompassing international systems of which they are a part”. [5]

On the whole, it can be said that foreign policies are strategies devised by governments to guide their actions in the international arena. Therefore, they spell out the basic objectives that the state leaders have decided to pursue in a given relationship or situation as the general means by which they intend to realize their basic objectives. The arduous task before the decision-makers is to identify the political, economic and psychological needs of their country and also to recognize the limitations involved in their pursuit and to work out “a well-defined and well-ordered set of foreign policy objectives”.[6]
