which is war, becomes inoperative too. But Palmer and Perkins have serious reservations on this and they contend that diplomacy does not cease to function, as Nicolson suggests, in times of war. Although its role may be different in wartime, the work of diplomats and ministers expands during wartime. They cite the examples of two World Wars as a convincing support for their argument. The crux of the whole debate is that diplomacy is the method and foreign policy is the substance, which is executed by the use of diplomatic technique. A British diplomat once remarked, “foreign policy is what you do; and diplomacy is how you do it”.
