“the diplomacy of violence”. All of these actually suggest that war has become a part of diplomacy. He uses the terms ‘coercive warfare’ and ‘compellance’ to describe the significance of military power for achieving goals that are not strictly military at all and the “object is to make the enemy behave”. The core of this policy is to hurt, to cause pain and suffering. The classic example is that the two atom bombs dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki at the end of the Second World War which were not really aimed at these cities, but rather the target was the decision-makers in Tokyo. In Schelling’s words: “The effect of the bombs and their purpose were not mainly the military destruction they accomplished but the pain and the shock and the promise of more”. This was again illustrated during the 2003 US military campaign against Iraq post 9/11 terrorist attacks on USA. The whole strategy was to create “shock and awe” in the minds of the enemies in order to force it to behave in the way desired by the UN as well as the US.

Related to the military power there is the growing influence of a powerful “military–industrial complex”. The whole concept of “military–industrial complex” includes both labour unions and politicians whose districts would benefit directly from military spending. Even if American economy as a whole could survive and prosper without military spending, some industries and geographic areas would suffer from any sort of reduction in military expenditure. Military–industrial complex tries hard to maintain their business and add new contracts and, in this endeavour, they are helped by government policies. Post-Cold War closures of domestic military bases and the end of the Cold War itself have renewed the debate of the importance of military–industrial complex. There have been serious questions whether there will be a “peace dividend” of money formerly spent on arms race to meet the welfare needs of the civilian population. USA and many other countries are faced with a dilemma between its large military establishment and its liberal democratic prrinciples. President Eisenhower called the military–industrial complex as a very real symptom of this dilemma. There have been several attempts of disarmament and arms control, but without much effect, and military security and use of military power still remains central to the conduct of international relations.
