everyone in the world. One should not overlook the benefits of mutual advantage and cooperation. As the Brandt Reports remind us, prosperity in the South can lead to prosperity in the North; but economic trouble in the South can wreak havoc in the North as well. The only alternative in sight is mobilizing the South and working towards a South–South cooperation. The emergence of a new grouping of the developing states, G-15 in 1989 and their subsequent summits are working for forging a strong South–South cooperation. The NAM, CHOGM, G-77 and other international fora outside the UN have also been mobilized to champion the cause for a new world order of developing countries but without much effect. The adoption of the International Development Strategy, the Declaration on the New International Economic Order and the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States have been the outcome of decade-long diplomacy and untiring efforts of the developing countries, but in practice, as Prof. Jayantanuja Bandyopadhyaya[20] points out, “the acceptance of this demand by the UN General Assembly has proved to be hardly anything more than a mere nominal recognition of the urge of the LDCs for a greater share in the world distribution of resources. If the resolutions of the General Assembly reflect the majority of the LDCs in the UN, their non-implementation by the developed countries shows the oligarchic and neo-imperialistic control of the developed countries over the concrete structure of contemporary international relations”.
