the voting procedure of the Security Council. The presence of the system of 'veto' is the most conspicuous element in this voting procedure. It calls for an affirmative vote of nine members to arrive at decisions on procedural matters and an affirmative vote of nine members including the concurring votes of the permanent members for all other matters. Each member of the Security Council shall have one vote.

Decisions on procedural matters are made by an affirmative vote of at least nine of the 15 members. Decisions on substantive matters require nine votes, including the concurring votes of all five permanent members. This is the rule of great Power unanimity, often referred to as the "veto" power. The exclusive "veto" power of the P-5 reflects the unequal structure of the UN Security Council and also most of ten hinders the UN from taking actions disapproved by the P-5 of the Security Council.

A member state against which preventive or enforcement action has been taken by the Security Council may be suspended from the exercise of the rights and privileges of membership by the General Assembly on the recommendation of the Security Council. A member state, which has persistently violated the principles of the Charter, may be expelled from the United Nations by the Assembly on the Council's recommendation.

Any member of the United Nations, which is not a member of the Security Council, may participate, without vote, in the discussion of any question brought before the Security Council whenever the latter considers that the interests of that Member are specially affected (Article 31).

A State, which is a member of the United Nations but not of the Security Council, may participate, without a vote, in its discussions when the Council considers that the country's interests are affected. Both members of the United Nations and non-members, if they are considered parties to a dispute by the Council, are invited to take part, without a vote, in the Council's discussions, and the Council sets the conditions for participation by a non-member State (Article 32).

Under the Charter, all members of the United Nations agree to
