economic, political and social rights, including the right to development.

- Measures the impact of its work through the substantive benefit that is accrued through it to individuals around the world.

Operationally, OHCHR works with governments, legislatures, courts, national institutions, the civil society, regional and international organizations, and the United Nations system. This, it does to develop and strengthen capacity, particularly at the national level, for the protection of human rights in accordance with international norms. It serves a forum for identifying, highlighting and developing responses to as human rights challenges, and encourages in human rights research, education, public information, and advocacy.

OHCHR's method of work focuses on three major dimensions: standard-setting, monitoring and implementation of programmes. It offers the expertise, and substantive and secretariat support to the different United Nations human rights bodies. It also tries to ensure that the international human rights standards are implemented in reality.
