domineering authority too [Book I on Concerning Discipline].

Hobbes[10] in his Leviathan portrays a state of nature, which is horrific and undoubtedly anarchic. The root cause of this anarchy lies at the basic characteristics of human nature, which persuades every man to be enemy of every man for three principal causes—competition, diffidence and glory. Therefore, in such a condition there are “no arts; no letters; no society; and which is worst of all, continual fear, and danger of violent death; and the life of man, solitary, poor, nasty, brutish, and short”. Force and fraud are the two cardinal virtues. To come out of this situation, man entered into a contract—‘a covenant of every man with every man’ and thus the multitude united in one person—the Commonwealth, in Latin, civitas. Therefore, the Leviathan,—the immortal God, was born and with it came into existence the sovereign, the civil society and the political authority.

Political realists, deriving their basic assumptions from these philosophic expositions, believe that mankind is not inherently benevolent but rather self-centred and competitive. From this, they propagate that states are also inherently aggressive (offensive realism) and/or obsessed with security (defensive realism); and that territorial expansion is only constrained by opposing power(s). This aggressive build-up, however, leads to a security dilemma where increasing one’s own security can bring along greater instability as the opponent(s) builds up its own arms. Thus, security is a zero-sum game where only relative gains can be made. The chief proponents of political realism were E.H. Carr (1939), N.J. Spykman (1942), Reinhold Niebuhr (1947), George F. Kennan (1954 and 1966), Hans J. Morgenthau (1948) and Kenenth W. Thompson (1958 and 1960).
