Nehru was against the creation of military blocs in Asia and Africa and he saw their creation as a manifestation of neo-colonialism. He also abhorred racialism and delivering the Presidential address of the Indian National Congress session on 24 January 1954, Nehru said the issues confronting the Third World countries were colonialism and racialism. India under Nehru also showed a strong commitment to the struggle against imperialism and colonialism as well as a commitment to the unity of the struggling nation of the world. India gave a call for the freedom of all countries under the colonial rule and solidarity with the worldwide anti-imperialist struggle and was vocal in various international fora like the General Assembly, Conferences of Non-aligned Movement, and spoke in unison with the Third World countries for a New International Economic Order.

Regarding Nehru's policy towards India's neighbour, it can be said that India's bilateral relations with Nepal, Bhutan and Sri Lanka remained, by and large, cordial. There were some irritants in Indo–Nepal relations, which stemmed from Nehru's reaction to the Royal Coup in Nepal in 1960 and also in India–Sri Lankan relations because of granting citizenship to the Tamil plantation workers in northern Sri Lanka.[6]
