internalized and transformed into a modern theory of international relations. During the Cold War it became the most widely accepted perspective of world politics. As Rothenstein§[13] pointed out, realism became the “doctrine which provided the intellectual frame of reference for the (US) foreign policy establishment for something like twenty years… it did determine the categories by which they assessed the external world and the state of mind with which they approached prevailing problems”. Realism prevailed as the dominant paradigm with its emphasis on the autonomy of political action and the “billiard ball” model in IR till it was challenged by the behavioural revolution. But it again re-emerged in the form of neo-realism in the 1970s.
