INTRODUCTION

With time, the engagement with international politics by scholars have assumed different dimensions. The developments in the international scenario, improvement of transport and communication, globalization, expansion of labour market, outbreak of armed conflicts, civil wars, identity politics and various other crucial factors have led to the movement of people across the globe. This movement has been labeled as ‘migration’ by the international community. Migrations take several forms but those of migrants who fall under the category of refugees have become a great concern for the states in international politics. This chapter will look into migration and those groups of people categorized as refugees and various predicaments involving the refugees.
