Ba Maw (1893–1977). A Burmese political leader active from the early 1930s until 1945, and who rose to prominence as the defense lawyer for rebel leader Saya San. He went on to become an outspoken advocate of Burmese independence. Founder of the Sinyetha Party, Ba Maw was elected to parliament in 1936 and served as premier of Burma from 1937 to 1939. He was imprisoned from 1940 to 1942 by the British. During the Japanese occupation of Burma Ba Maw was the head of the Burmese provisional administration. In 1945, he fled to Japan, where he was captured by the American occupation authorities. He was tried and imprisoned during 1945 to 1946. Following his release he returned to Burma. He was again imprisoned during the rule of General Ne Win.

Bagyidaw (1784–1846). Also known as Maung Sein, he was the grandson of King Bodawpaya and the seventh king of the Konbaung dynasty; he reigned from 1819 until his abdication in 1837. He was made the general of the Northern and Southern Corps of the Royal Cavalry at the age of nine by his grandfather. At the age of 18 he married Princess Hsinbyume, who was the granddaughter of Bodawpaya. His reign saw the first Anglo-Burmese war (1824–1826) that culminated in the Treaty of Yandabo in which the Burmese ceded all of Bodawpaya's western territorial acquisitions and Tenasserim to the British, and pay a large indemnity. His brother Crown Prince Tharrawaddy forced Bagyidaw to abdicate the throne in April 1837.

Binnya Dala (??–1774). He was the last king of the Mon-speaking Restored kingdom of Hanthawaddy; he reigned from 1747 to 1757. Binnya Dala was a key leader in the revolt against the Toungoo dynasty. He succeeded Smim Htaw Buddhaketi following the latter's abdication in 1747. In 1752, he launched an invasion of Upper Burma in which he captured the capital of the Toungoo dynasty, Ava. In 1757, Pegu fell to Alaùngpayà,
