	American John Yettaw swam uninvited to her lakeside residence. Yettaw is sentenced to seven years hard labor but is released when U.S. Senator Jim Webb intervenes on his behalf.
2010	The SPDC announces a new election law that bans political prisoners and monks participation in the forthcoming national elections. The law disqualifies Aung San Suu Kyi from participating due to her previous convictions.
	The NLD refuses to participate in the forthcoming elections.
	The SPDC announces elections will be held on November 7. The Union Solidarity and Development Party (USDP) wins by a large majority. Opposition and Western observers allege widespread fraud.
	Aung San Suu Kyi is released a week after the elections.
2011	Thein Sein is sworn in as president.
	The government frees thousands of prisoners under an amnesty.
	Aung San Suu Kyi is invited to several meetings with government officials, including President Thein Sein in Naypyidaw.
	President Thein Sein lifts restrictions on the media and the Internet. The government passes a law allowing the establishment of trade unions.
	A 17-year ceasefire between the Myanmar and the KIA is broken when fighting erupts along the northern border.
	The government of Myanmar suspends construction of the $3.6 billion Chinese-funded Myitsone hydroelectric dam on the upper Ayeyarwaddy River in northern Kachin state.
	Myanmar agrees to hold the rotating chairmanship of the ASEAN in 2014.
	Aung San Suu Kyi says she will stand for a seat in parliament in the Kawhmu constituency in the April 1, 2012, elections as the NLD rejoins the political process.
	U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton visits Myanmar. She holds talks with President Thein Sein in the capital of Naypyidaw and meets with Aung San Suu Kyi in Yangon. The visit was the first senior American official to Myanmar in over 50 years.
	Myanmar participates in an international landmine ban meeting in Cambodia for the first time.
	The government signs a truce with Shan rebels and halts military operations against ethnic Kachin rebels.
2012	British Foreign Secretary William Hague meets with President Thein Sein and other senior government leaders. Mr. Hague also meets with opposition leader Aung San Suu Kyi. The visit is the first by a British foreign secretary since 1955.