Hkrit was occupied only for 12 years as ecological problems forced Danuyupol (r. ca. 1151–1160) to abandon the newly built city. Sambawak was reoccupied in 1154, beginning the short-lived second Sambawak dynasty. Danuyupol was assassinated by a noble named Salangarbo (r. ca. 1160–1161) in 1160. Salangarbo was in turn replaced by Myitzuthin (r. ca. 1161–1163) who moved the capital to Myohaung Toungoo to the east bank of the Lemro River. Seventeen kings ruled for Myohaung Toungoo for a period of 85 years before the last king of the dynasty, Alawmarphyun moved the capital to Launggret. Launggret was founded by the legendary King Mun Htee in 1247, at a time when Bagan's power was beginning to wane. According the Arakanese chronicles Mun Htee ruled for 96 years. Under Mun Htee Launggret managed to become independent and began to expand its authority west into Bengal, Cape Negrais in the south, and to the west bank of the Ayeyarwaddy in the east. Following the founding of Launggret, the Arakanese chronicles detail a turbulent 12th century CE. This period saw a Talaing invasion in the south, a weakening of the legitimacy of the monarch, and several usurpers to the throne.

The Lemro period would come to an end in 1406 when Burmese forces led by Min Khaung Yaza occupied Launggret and deposed Min Saw Mon who fled to the court of Gaisuddin Azam Shah in Gaur, the capital of the Bengal sultanate. Min Saw Mon as Suleiman Shah (r. ca. 1430–1433) stayed in exile in Gaur for 24 years before regaining his throne in 1430 and built the new capital city of Mrauk-U. Min Saw Mon's Bengali followers were allowed to settle in and around Mrauk-U, thus becoming the earliest Muslim settlers in Arakan. Muslim rule and influence in Arakan lasted for more than 350 years.

THE MRAUK-U DYNASTY (1430–1784)

According to the Arakanese chronicles Min Saw Mon as Suleiman Shah is considered the founder of the Mrauk-U dynasty. Min Saw Mon and his successors adopted the custom of taking a Muslim name. It is said that he was exiled from Arakan by invading Burmese troops from the kingdom of Ava. After 24 years in exile Min Saw Mon regained control of the throne with military support of Gaisuddin Azam Shah, the sultan of Bengal. In return for the sultan's assistance the Suleiman Shah agreed to cede southern Chittagong to Bengal and pay an annual tribute. According to the Arakanese
