states) in an attempt to reassert suzerainty over Burma. Ava briefly controlled Arakan (1379–1420) and came close to defeating Pegu, but could never unify Burma again. By the 1480s the continuous wars waged against Hanthawaddy Pegu and the Shan states created political instability in Ava. The power of Ava began to wane between 1480 and 1520 as internal strife weakened the state. The Mong Yang ruler Shwenankyawshin launched a series of raids against Ava and its allies between 1524 and 1527. Eventually the Shan principality of Mong Yang launched a series of raids that culminated in the capture of Ava in 1527. A Mong Yang–led confederation of Shan mongs ruled Upper Burma until the Shan mongs began to disintegrate. When King Tabengshweti's son-in-law Bayinnaung (r. ca. 1554–1584) ascended the throne, he sought to reassert Burman control over Upper Burma, capturing Ava in 1555, and laying the foundations of the second Burmese empire, Toungoo.
