rebellions during his tumultuous reign. Upon succession to the throne, Nanda Bayin was immediately faced with a rebellion by his uncle, the viceroy of Ava. Nanda Bayin was able to defeat his uncle but was unable to subjugate their allies, Ayutthaya. In 1595, faced with the prospect of widespread rebellion and the potential loss of sovereignty to Portuguese interests, the rulers of Toungoo withdrew from Lower Burma and founded a second dynasty, the Restored Toungoo dynasty at Ava, following the sacking of Pegu by a combination of Arakanese and mutinous Toungoo forces. A rebellion led by Prince Naresuan defeated several of Nanda Bayin's armies, while Nanda Bayin himself was killed during his fifth invasion of Siam.

Bayinnaung's son and Nanda Bayin's half brother Nyaunggan Min was one of the many claimants to the Burmese throne following the deposition of Nanda Bayin. Instead of contesting his claim to the throne with other claimants, Nyaunggan Min focused on recapturing the Shan states and deflecting the interest of neighboring Siam. This is why Nyaunggan Min is referred to as the founder of the Restored Toungoo or Nyaunggan dynasty at Ava. Throughout his brief reign (r. ca. 1599–1606), Nyaunggan Min managed to reestablish suzerainty over Upper Burma and the surrounding Shan states. His death in 1606 ushered in the reign of his son Anaukhpetlun (r. ca. 1605–1628). Anaukhpetlun began his reign by clearing the Ayeyarwaddy delta of Arakanese and their Mon and Portuguese allies by capturing the cities of Prome in 1607 and Toungoo in 1610. In 1612, Portuguese mercenary Philip de Brito y Nicote and the king of Martaban invaded Toungoo, plundered the city, and attacked the palace before the attack was halted. In response, King Anaukhpetlun sent land and river forces to Syriam, laying siege and blockading the city. Syriam would eventually fall in 1613 when a Mon chief opened the city's gates to let Anaukhpetlun's forces in. De Brito was executed and Anaukhpetlun consolidated his rule over the south. He then captured Martaban, Ye, and Tavoy, giving Toungoo control over the coastline from Bassein in the west to the Gulf of Martaban down the Tenasserim littoral to Tavoy.

The next year Anaukhpetlun and his brother, the future king Thalun (r. ca. 1629–1648), launched an invasion of Lan Na (Chiang Mai) to regain control of the Tai states east of the Salween River. Following his conquest of the Tai states, Anaukhpetlun then invaded neighboring Siam, occupying
