Smim Htaw Buddhaketi (r. ca. 1740–1747) to be the first king of the Restored kingdom of Pegu. Unable or unwilling to take charge of the government or to lead the army, Smim Htaw Buddhaketi left governing and command and control of the army to his prime minister, a Shan noble named Binnya Dala. Pegu launched invasions against its northern rivals Prome and Ava. Smim Htaw Buddhaketi abdicated the throne in 1747 and left for Chiang Mai. He was replaced by Binnya Dala (r. ca. 1747–1757), the last ruler of the Restored kingdom of Pegu.

In 1750, the Qing dynasty in China sent troops to support Mahadhammaraja Dipiti but were defeated by the Mons. After consolidating control over Lower Burma, Binnya Dala launched an invasion of Ava during the dry season of 1751–1752. The crown prince of Pegu (Binnya Dala's brother) led the Mon and Shan armies into the Upper Ayeyarwaddy and laid siege to the cities of Sagaing and Ava. Ava fell to the Mon in 1752, and Mahadhammaraja Dipiti, his court, and about 20,000 prisoners were captured and taken back to Pegu. Mahadhammaraja Dipiti remained in captivity for another two years before he was executed for his suspected involvement with his supporters in formulating a potential rebellion. Mahadhammaraja Dipiti's death ended the Restored Toungoo dynasty and heralded a short period of conflict between the Burman and the Mon before a Burman village chief in Ava, U Aung Zeiya, led a revolt against Mon rule. The Burmese attacked and defeated the Mon at Pegu in 1757, thus beginning the Konbaung dynasty (1752–1885).
