On January 1, 1886, Burma was proclaimed part of Her Majesty's dominions. While the British faced little or no resistance from the Burmese army, the British occupation of Upper Burma sparked resistance and rebellion among the populace. By mid 1886 the British were forced to send reinforcements from India as violence had spread throughout Upper Burma and most of Lower Burma. The British response to the disturbances was to shoot anyone caught possessing arms and burning entire villages. The tactics backfired on the British as villagers responded to the repression by attacking military outposts. By 1890, the British had pacified much of the resistance.
