3) Complex made relatable

I first came across Digit when I was exploring tech and learning more about how technology can solve real-world problems. What stayed with me was how Digit makes complex topics feel simple and relatable. It helped me see technology not just as something to study, but as something that can genuinely shape the way we understand and interact with the world. I'm excited to be a part of the Digit community. As a new reader, I'm looking forward to discovering more stories, ideas and perspectives through Digit. Keep inspiring young tech enthusiasts like me!

4) A source of joy

It's a source of joy for me. It has given me myself. I have started loving spending time with myself. It helps me heal. You're doing great – keep it up, and keep bringing new, innovative things just like you are doing.

5) A subscriber since the Chip days

I've been a subscriber since the Chip days. Very happy silver jubilee! I would like to read your 50th year magazine in print too.

6) An honest confession

Honestly, I don't have an extraordinary memory of Digit to share. The first time I picked it up was when I entered my college library for the first time, and I chose it completely at random.

But I still wanted to write to you – not just because I'd love to see my words published someday, but also because I genuinely appreciate the consistency with which you've kept Digit going. In a world where so many publications come and go or constantly change, maintaining something for this long is no small achievement.

So, even if I don't have a grand Digit story, I just wanted to say: keep going. There are probably many readers like me who may not always say it, but who appreciate the work you continue to put out.

I am a true admirer of yours, as I have great enthusiasm for writing as well as being a computer applications student at SJCE, Mysore, Karnataka. Please keep going. I wish that one day I become a part of your team, immediately after my graduation.
