The festive shopping season is approaching, and a majority of respondents to the latest Digit Research survey said they are planning to purchase a technology or electronics product between September and October. The survey received 5,923 responses between August 1 and 31, 2026, covering purchase plans, preferred product categories, budgets, sale events, payment methods and shopping behaviour.

According to the survey, 56.25% of respondents said they will definitely make a tech or electronics purchase during this year's festive sale season. Another 26.89% said they may purchase something depending on the deals available. Meanwhile, 16.86% said they are not planning to buy any technology or electronics products during the period.

Better discounts biggest reason to wait for festive sales

Among respondents planning to wait until the festive season, 65.89% said better discounts and offers are their primary reason. No-cost EMI options came next at 11.71%, while 8.78% said they were already planning to make a purchase around this time specifically, according to our polling.

Exchange offers on an old device were cited by 7.97% of respondents, while 5.65% said bank card cashback deals were main reason for waiting.

The responses indicate that discounts are considerably more important than other promotional benefits included in the survey.

Smartphones are the most sought-after category

Smartphones were the most popular product category among respondents, with 45.31% saying they were most likely to purchase one. TVs followed at
