Flights, fan queues and farewells

September arrived with packed bags, birthday cake, event lanyards, a sleepless Apple night, one very necessary pav bhaji and a farewell that hit harder than most. If August was about pulling together on one big stage, September was about being everywhere at once — and somehow still finding time for a little nonsense in between.

Yash began the month in Mumbai, where professional obligations were quickly followed by an equally important local requirement: pav bhaji for lunch. No vada pav was harmed in the process. He was not alone. Manas made the trip too, and together with Jayesh and Vyom, the four pulled off another partner event with the kind of polish that makes long hours and complicated logistics look deceptively easy. They also looked unusually sharp doing it.

Back in the office, celebrations arrived in pairs. Bharat and Divyanshi cut their birthday cakes on the same day, giving the team twice the reason to gather, clap and momentarily abandon deadlines. Not long after, Yash, Bharat, Krishika and some of the younger Digitians decided adulthood had been overrated anyway. Their solution was to form a human train, complete with enthusiastic horn noises. Serious technology publication. Very serious people.

A month of celebrations and many cakes

That dignity lasted until Apple night.

The team pulled an all-nighter to cover Apple's September event, chasing announcements, stories and videos deep into the night. By the end, Yash had become the unofficial face of the newsroom: completely exhausted, visibly finished and representing everyone rather accurately. Sometimes the most honest event recap is simply one very tired person staring into the distance.

There was a reason for Aman Rashid to be missing for much of the month. He got married to the love of his life, looking suitably dapper at the evening reception. From everyone at Digit, congratulations and best wishes to the newlyweds for their next chapter together.

Then came iPhone launch day. As the iPhone 18 Pro series reached stores, Vyom in Mumbai, Yash and Roshni in New Delhi, and Siddharth Malhotra were up earlier than anyone should reasonably be, covering queues, excited buyers and the rituals of launch morning. It was a proper team shift before most had finished breakfast.

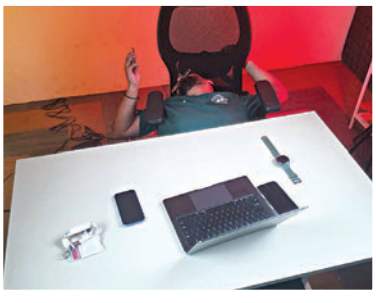

September also sent Digit further afield. Mithun and Manas covered major international launches in person, spanning IFA 2026, Apple's iPhone launch and Snapdragon Summit 2026. Different cities, different stages, same familiar scramble to turn announcements into stories.

But the month ended on a quieter note. Siddharth Chauhan signed off from Digit on his final working day. Goodbyes are part of every newsroom, but some leave a larger silence behind. Sid made an impression on the people around him, and his departure was genuinely emotional. He will be missed here, even as everyone wishes him well for whatever comes next.

That was September. Travel, launches, laughter, lost sleep and one difficult goodbye. Human as always.

A sharp evening in Mumbai

After effects of the Apple event