
KEY
ARAGONESE FLEET
2 Aragonese war galleys
1 small Aragonese scout ship
ANGEVIN FLEET
2 Angevin galleys
1 small Angevin guard boat
The Angevins place two boats to guard the harbor entrance, moored close to the shore
An Aragonese boat slips into the harbor under cover of darkness. Rowing with muffled oars, the crew spies out the Angevins' strength and positions
Di Lauria's galley fleet arrives from Sicily during the night
FORT ST ANGELO
GRAND HARBOR
Angevin galleys are beached close to the fort. With their sterns to the shore, their position is easily defended
1 NIGHT BEFORE THE BATTLE
The Aragonese galleys reach the harbor on the night of July 7. Di Lauria orders them to remain outside the harbor while he sends a small boat inside to reconnoiter. The Angevins have posted two guard boats, but these fail to spot the intruder.
2 CLASH IN THE HARBOR
Di Lauria decides to fight in open water rather than attack the Angevins on shore. Taking up a position at the harbor entrance, he orders his trumpeters to wake the Angevins. The latter hastily board their galleys and row out to do battle.
Just before sunrise, di Lauria deploys his galleys in line abreast across the harbor entrance. The ships are tied together with strong cables to stop the enemy from breaking through
The Angevins, roused from their slumbers by the Aragonese trumpets, sail out to do battle with the enemy
The Angevins attack the Aragonese with spears, crossbows, and other projectiles
FORT ST. ANGELO
GRAND HARBOR
3 CRUSHING VICTORY
The Angevins attack fiercely but eventually run out of ammunition. Di Lauria's men now emerge to start firing themselves, then grapple and board the enemy galleys, capturing most of them and slaughtering their crews.
A few Angevin galleys manage to escape the carnage in the harbor and return to Marseille
MEDITERRANEAN SEA
The Aragonese close on their defenseless foe, unleashing a hail of missiles, then start boarding the Angevin ships
FORT ST. ANGELO
The Angevins start to run out of crossbow bolts and other ammunition
GRAND HARBOR