any specific territory. Instead, it was only given fifteen car permits worth US$50,000 each, and thirty car permits with sixty per cent of tax waived.[16] Given the PNO's income source is recurrent, and the PNLO only received a one-off gain, the ceasefire agreement clearly favoured the PNO and reflects the regime's divide-and-rule strategy (Figure 5.2).

CSOs and the political order after 2010

The emergent CSOs can be seen as political socialization agents trying to reinforce, or even impose, a certain political culture on the Pa-O youth community. Political culture is the learning of political attitudes and behaviours (Kourvetaris 1997, p. 101). This is not a normal knowledge acquisition process, but a conscious, deliberate, sometimes manipulative form of learning. Whereas political culture is "a product of the history of the political system and the individual members of the system" (Dowse and Hughes 1986, p. 227), in the case of Pa-O, these CSOs are cultivating a political culture that is not indigenous, but rather, is based on Western values.

The political socialization process in the Pa-O community takes two forms; the first is via learning, and the second is through reaffirmation of values. To give an example of the first form, KRSAN holds regular English reading classes for Pa-O youth in their centre. On one occasion, a group
