the ANP will be the largest party with forty-nine per cent representation in the State Hluttaw, but it does not have the control of the assembly in its own right. It would have to work together with either the NLD, which controls around nineteen per cent of the state legislature, or the military, with nine members, and the USDP and military coalition of thirty-two per cent with fifteen members.

The ANP won the popular vote in Rakhine State, receiving fifty-one per cent of the valid votes across the state for the combined three houses. The ANP also gained fifty-three per cent of the state's popular vote for the national seats. However it did not win the popular vote for the State Hluttaw, with only forty-nine per cent of all the valid votes (SEDI 2015). At the constituency level, the NLD won in Thandwe District, the southern-most part of the state, while the ANP won most seats and got the largest proportion of votes in Kyaukphyu District, had landslide wins in every seat in Sittwe District, and had a joint victory with the USDP in Maungdaw District.

In Thandwe, the NLD received the strongest support and won all the seats. In three townships in Thandwe and nearby Munaung township, all seats for both national and state levels went to the NLD. In the southern-most Gwa township, the NLD gained more than sixty per cent of the valid votes, which is on par with seats in other parts of the country. However, Gwa was the only Rakhine township where the NLD received the majority vote. In Thandwe, Toungup, and Munaung townships, the NLD got the highest vote, but not the majority. In Munaung Constituency (1) for the State Hluttaw, the NLD defeated the ANP's president, Dr Aye Maung. Despite his high profile, Aye Maung did not win more than twenty-eight per cent of the votes in Munaung. From a historical perspective, the NLD also won with significant majorities in these townships in the 1990 election. These southern townships were also the only places in Rakhine State that Daw Aung San Suu Kyi visited during the 2015 election campaign amid the controversies around her response (or non-response) to the communal conflicts in the state.

In other townships in Kyaukpyu District, namely Kyaukpyu, Ramree, and Ann, the ANP received the highest proportion of votes but not the majority. The ANP won all seats for the national and state assemblies in these two townships, except the State Ann Constituency (1). This seat was won by USDP, for the former chief minister, General Maung Maung Ohn. In the 1990 election, the NLD won all the seats for Kyaukpyu District.