The ANP received a majority of votes in all seats in Sittwe District, except in Myebon Constituency (1) and Ponnagyun Constituency (2) for the State Hluttaw. The Sittwe Constituency (2) was also an exception, since the ANP did not field a candidate but two independents who claimed to have a close association with it received the most votes. In Rathaedaung, Mrauk-U, Pauktaw, Minbya, and Kyauktaw townships, the ANP achieved resounding victories with its share of votes being more than sixty per cent.

In northern Maungdaw district, with the vast majority of residents excluded from voting, the ANP and USDP shared votes and seats. While township-wide seats for Pyithu Hluttaw went to the ANP, the USDP gained one seat for Amyotha Hlutaw from Maungdaw, and two out of four State Hluttaw seats.

In constituencies in these northern townships, the USDP did better than the NLD in terms of votes. These constituencies were among the few where the NLD only gained a small proportion of votes, less than ten per cent. Out of 168 Amyotha Hluttaw seats, the NLD received less than ten per cent in only eight constituencies, and seven of those were in northern Rakhine State[5]. Out of 323 Pyithu Hluttaw seats, the NLD got less than ten per cent of votes in only ten seats. Eight were in Rakhine State. Out of 630 State or Region Hluttaws, the NLD did not gain more than ten per cent of the votes in 34 seats; 16 were from the northern townships in Rakhine State. The electoral results showed that constituencies in northern parts of Rakhine State rejected the NLD.

Buddhist nationalism and anti-Muslim sentiment played a key role in the way people of Buthidaung and Maungdaw voted. The minority Buddhist communities in these townships, which in 2015 were the voting majority, supported either the USDP or ANP. For example, in Buthidaung constituency for the Pyithu Hluttaw, the ANP gained 46 per cent, while the USDP got 40 per cent. The Buddhist communities in Buthidaung and Maungdaw consisted of not just Rakhine people, but also a large number of NaTaLa model villages occupied by military veterans and ethnic minority groups. Detailed voter backgrounds are not available, but it is likely that most of their votes went to the USDP, probably with support from a small proportion of the Muslim community still entitled to vote, delivering it three seats from this district.

In Sittwe District, the exclusion of white-card holders and Rakhine ethnic nationalism created landslide wins for the ANP, gaining an average of sixty-seven per cent of votes. Ethnic nationalism has always been strong
