accessibility to the law in Myanmar than in the past (presuming internet access, which remains unreliable).

In this chapter I focus on the relationship between conflict and the Union Parliament's legislative output from 2010 to 2015. First, I question the extent to which the law reform agenda differs from past patterns of law-making, particularly in terms of the way law relates to conflict. I identify and explore three main issues on the legislative reform agenda: structural governance reforms; economic and business reforms; and social reforms. I suggest many of these reforms have been informed by past debates and efforts at law reform. While each of these three areas of change have generated new tensions and conflict between key institutions and actors, in many ways there is continuity in terms of law's relation to conflict. I then consider these legal reforms in terms of their textual content and structure. I explore the ways these laws have been used to manage and avoid conflict, primarily by keeping disputes away from the courts. At the same time, some laws in this period of political uncertainty have, intentionally or unintentionally, exacerbated conflict. I conclude with reflections on the direction of the law reform agenda, suggesting the need for greater awareness of the dual capacity of law to both prevent and foster conflict in Myanmar.

STRUCTURAL GOVERNANCE REFORMS: CONFLICT BETWEEN INSTITUTIONS

The first major area of reform has been structural governance reforms that implemented the new constitutional and legal system. These structural reforms put in place the implementing laws required under the Constitution, yet most did not add significantly to the text of the Constitution itself. In establishing the three arms of government, and the role of the military in governance, the law has sought to manage conflict between key governance institutions, both old institutions (such as the military), revamped institutions, and new institutions. It has done this primarily by giving the president and the executive significant power and control, particularly over the courts. It has also generated new layers of institutional conflict, particularly between the president and the parliament, and towards the Constitutional Tribunal. I illustrate these new areas of conflict concerning the institutional legal framework through the
