political participation, and views of democracy, globalization, and regional powers. Many of the Myanmar-specific questions are directly related to conflict and are highlighted below. The public findings of the survey were released in August 2015, with a report available in early 2016.[3] As with the practice of all the ABS data, the Myanmar data will also be available publicly for scholars and practitioners after a one-year embargo, from August 2016.

The Myanmar ABS survey adopted random stratified sampling from available population data provided by the Myanmar Ministry of Immigration and Population and the General Administration Department (GAD). A total of thirty-six sampling points or townships were randomly selected, weighted for a representative distribution between rural and urban areas and including all fifteen major administrative states and regions (including the capital). In each township or sampling point, three villages/wards were randomly selected based on a representative urban-rural even weighting. In each village/ward, fifteen respondents were randomly selected through landmark sampling that assured each citizen in the selected community had an equal chance of being chosen. Landmarks were selected after initial fieldwork and were reviewed after the pilot survey. They included the Union Solidarity and Development Party (USDP) office, the village welcome sign, a religious institution, a non-USDP political party office, a village headman's office/home and more, and were assigned randomly to different interviewers to assure all the households in the community had an equal chance of being chosen. Gender and age distribution was randomly assigned at the landmark sampling level. After the release of the Myanmar census data in May 2015, the data was weighted to conform to the released demographic information, urban-rural differences, as well as the age and gender breakdowns. The sampling methodology complied with the rigor followed in similar ABS and Global Barometer surveys. To assure quality fieldwork, a series of quality control measures — from random checks in the field to retesting by another survey team — were conducted. There is a technical report detailing the sampling and methods.[4]

The ABS was implemented by the Yangon School of Political Science (YSPS) and funded by the Taiwan Foundation for Democracy (TFD) and the National Endowment for Democracy (NED) with volunteer contributions by ABS scholars from National Taiwan University and regional ABS survey network teams.[5] The survey was conducted from January through
