only slightly more than a third of ethnic minorities agreed that they received equal treatment from the government, with this number slightly higher in ethnic minority states where ethnic minorities may make up the majority population of the state or an administrative sub-region within it. This view of unequal treatment among ethnic minorities sharply contrasts with that of the Bamar majority, who do not see the issue of inequality along ethnic lines as an issue. Nearly two-thirds of Bamar think there is equal treatment of ethnic minorities. There is a stark difference in how the majority and minorities perceive the government's interventions towards ethnic minorities.

These concerns about the treatment of the government toward ethnic minorities extend into the evaluation of the current peace process as offering protection for minority rights in the country. Respondents were asked to agree or disagree with the following statement: "The ongoing peace process will protect the rights of ethnic minority groups." While over fifty per cent of respondents view the process positively as a vehicle for rights protection, ethnic minorities are less confident about protection than the Bamar majority, sixty-four per cent compared to seventy-three per cent.

When one moves away from looking at the relationship between ethnic minorities and the government and examines how ethnic minorities perceive differences in society compared to views of the Bamar majority,
