alternative for Myanmar. There are no differences reported in the levels of support for democracy across faiths, as seventy-five per cent support democracy over other alternatives. Religious cleavages also do not impact the reported support for different political parties. Even months before the November 2015 election, religion or religiosity did not significantly impact partisan affinity. A majority of all religions, and even devout Buddhists, supported the NLD at statistically the same level, as shown in Figure 13.10. Religion was not a factor that divided Myanmar citizens along party lines. Across faiths a majority of citizens support democracy and wanted a different party at the helm. The voting results in November 2015 confirmed this finding. As with the differences along ethnic lines, religion did not divide Myanmar citizens when it came to potentially bringing about a more inclusive government with support of the NLD.

MINORITY CALL FOR CHANGE

Ethnic and religious minorities differed with the Bamar/Buddhist majority in their assessments of the incumbent government at the time of the data collection in 2015. Their reported views are more negative. Only a quarter of non-Buddhists and a third of ethnic minorities reported that the government was responsive to citizens, while this number was over forty per cent for Bamar and Buddhists, as shown in Figure 13.11.
