the posts were translated into Burmese and, at the time, the campaign had yet to attract any notice in the English-language press. We never learned who was behind the imposter Pan Zagar account, though the campaign members had a strong suspicion, so it is not possible to ask the creator or creators of the account why they chose to adapt content generated in the US for Myanmar. But adapt it they did, as useful (semiotic) material in digital form.

The contest over Pan Zagar is not an isolated case. Posts on Facebook that present Islam as a threat make regular and direct use of materials produced by Chao's "industry of Islamophobia" as well as other sources, such as Wikipedia and stories from international news media. In preparation for a training program for youth activists held by M.MAS in July 2015, for example, MIDO members analysed examples of posts on social media that underground monitoring networks had been collecting. Of twenty-seven examples that MIDO members prepared for a collection to be used in the training, seventeen included photos depicting events outside Myanmar.[19] These posts included photos such as of beheadings by ISIS — events of the kind friends in western Yangon brought up for discussion. Other examples included a post in Burmese and purporting to explain Sharia law, along with a link to the English-language Wikipedia page on Sharia. The Burmese-language explanation of Sharia did not match the content on the Wikipedia link; MIDO members explained that they thought the post was cleverly designed to make Burmese-language readers believe that the content had the authority that comes with citation, and that people might be unable to read the source page in English or unlikely to take the time to make a comparison between the two languages. Another example made similar clever use of a Burmese-language explanation along with a link to a story from Radio Australia.

Non-Burmese people outside Myanmar have also sought to offer direct support to people in Myanmar who they perceive to be victimized by Muslims. A series of papers by an American named Rik Heizman (2015), for example, bear incendiary titles such as "History Shows Buddhist Cultures Destroyed By Muslims: Is Arakan Next?" and "False and Manipulative Muslim Media". These papers are posted online for anyone to use — including, in at least one case, a Myanmar government inquiry committee convened to respond to Buddhist–Muslim violence (Republic of the Union of Myanmar 2013, p. 74). Heizman also authored a report for the Arakan Human Rights and Development Organization (2013, p. 11), which local
