media called "dangerous" (O'Toole 2013) and Elliot Prasse-Freeman described as "factually inaccurate, historically implausible, and poorly written and researched" (2014, pp. 17–18). Heizman is an example of the sometimes strikingly direct relationship between anti-Muslim discourses in Myanmar and elsewhere.

These examples have been of individual websites like The Religion of Peace or individuals like Heizman, but we should not mistake these relationships as individual. They are examples of individuals operating within larger arrangements of power: the positions they take towards Islam are indistinguishable from the political campaigns and debates on mainstream television I discussed above. Chao uses the term "industry of Islamophobia" as a way to group together the Religion of Peace and other similar websites, but the industry is much larger. Indeed, Nathan Lean (2012) has characterized such an industry much more broadly, to encompass not just bloggers, but television, radio, evangelical religious leaders, and politicians. Semiotic materials made use of in Myanmar thus draw not from groups on the fringes and elsewhere but from prominent, integrated, and well-funded networks with broadly analogous (anti-Muslim) ideological goals. Perhaps underscoring this best of all, after 9/11, the then-pariah military regime in Myanmar explicitly sought rapprochement with the US by seeking to align itself with regional counterterrorism efforts (Selth 2004, pp. 116–20).

It should be no surprise, that the spectre of "Islamic terrorism" in Burma has also been taken up by those addressing non-Myanmar audiences. The Religion of Peace website, for example, includes a sidebar displaying a regularly updated tabulation of "Islamic Terror Attacks". The tables used to detail the alleged incidents that aggregate into this number include, among others, attacks in Myanmar.[20] International media outlets such as The Independent (UK) and Newsweek (Popham 2015; O'Gara 2015) have used speculation about events in Myanmar to reinforce established narratives about global threats from Islamic terrorism. None of these stories appear to be based on any concrete evidence other than that groups including al-Qaeda have used violence against Muslims in Myanmar for the purposes of their own mobilization. They operate as if the potential for Muslim terrorism in Myanmar has already (always) been established.[21] The stories take this presumed potential and apply it to the Southeast Asia region. "Spreading such an idea in Myanmar is a killing licence", a friend, neighbour, and prominent activist told me one evening in July 2015. And while the intended
