addressees for such stories may not be people in Myanmar, they may be taken up as new and helpful materials in digital form.

Anti-Muslim materials from outside Myanmar also appear to be used as a way to situate fear of Islam within a kind of global community. Posts within the set analysed by MIDO, for example, included a collection of photos from an anti-Muslim demonstration in Australia. Demonstrators in the photo collection carry placards with messages including "Islamic Immigration = Genocide" and "I was beheaded because of Shariah Law".[22] The Burmese-language caption calls on people in Myanmar to similarly demonstrate against Islam. After attacks in Paris during November 2015, meanwhile, at least one French news outlet published a rebuttal to a Myanmar-language story circulating on Facebook captioned "A hundred thousand French people protested on November 22 to kick Muslims out of France." France 24's The Observers responded by tracking down the photos used in the Myanmar-language story, discovering that they were repurposed AFP photos from vigils to honour victims of the recent attacks (Team Observers 2015, p. 24).

DEFINING AND EXPANDING THE BOUNDARIES OF THREAT

The preceding section drew on examples from social media for two reasons: first, because digital forms leave trails of circulation that can be easily tracked, making legible times in which anti-Muslim discourse in Myanmar draws on materials produced elsewhere; and second, because social media posts present examples of arguments about Islam in the world that are addressed by and to Myanmar audiences rather than foreigners, resolving concerns about a potential confounding variable. These dynamics are not limited to social media of course. As detailed above, such discussions — reference to international events, news and information circulating between online and offline spaces — were regular occurrences in the everyday life as well as in our M.MAS interviews.

The core point here is that the construction of anti-Muslim narratives circulating within Myanmar draws on arguments that are not spatially limited to inside Myanmar. Narratives in Myanmar make use of materials emanating from outside the country: in the form of events and authority that can be referenced to strengthen claims applied in Myanmar; and in
