Q: Where do you get this information?

A: On Facebook, my friends show me when they see something there. They warn me to be aware of people's heads being cut off.[25]

The connection that makes ISIS and people in Myanmar interchangeable operates along a line defined in terms of religion. Outward signs of Islamic piety may entail icons of a religion — but they are also indexed as signs of 'extremism' and the potential for violence; no person can be indexed as Muslim without also being indexed as a threat. The following excerpt from an interview with a youth activist in the Delta illustrates the way religious devotion is taken as a sign for extremism:

My aunt's husband is Muslim. ... As he is my aunt's husband, we tried to see him as an uncle at first. Later, what happened was, they are very good at mobilizing for their religion. They are very religious people. … For them, from children to old people, they only trust their god. Then, eventually, they persuaded my aunt to their religion. At first, my aunt worshipped [Buddha] but later, she did not. He would persuade her with different ways until he got it. Now, she and the children who she gave birth to became Muslim. … I was also a friend with an Islam [Muslim]. … However, as I observed his behaviour and his beliefs, I noticed that he was very serious in his religious belief. To say it rudely, he was like an extremist. … At that time, I really wanted to do something to him but I tried to control myself. Later, it was fine. I just let it go and didn't argue with him much.[26]

In Myanmar, the boundaries of the threat are marked by religion and, so established, with this comes a threat that surrounds a nation, accompanies a religion everywhere, and can draw on source materials from anywhere.

MAKING SENSE OF VIOLENCE IN MYANMAR

What is opened up by considering the potential parallels — and relationships — between anti-Muslim narratives in Myanmar and those narratives developed elsewhere, especially since the expansion of the global "War on Terror" in the years after 9/11? I want to close this chapter by making three arguments:

First, noting these relationships highlights the importance of further research that seeks to understand the way threatening Others are being defined in Myanmar. This is a question about identities: religious, racial, Other. But it is also a question about spatial relationships: internal and
