identifies Facebook posts that they feel may cause conflict or tension within their geographic areas and shares screenshots with their closed network to warn each other and discuss responses. The twenty-seven posts analysed were those most recently shared within the group. Notably, because the group was not using a predefined set of criteria — for example, a standard definition of 'hate speech' — each post shared in the network represents a choice based on the analysis of an individual group member. It is thus particularly telling that, of the posts members identified as cause for concern, a large proportion drew on materials from outside Myanmar.

20 At end of 2015, the number displayed on the website reads 27,359. Data for the years 2012 and 2013 included allegations of attacks by Muslims, including an incident in Meiktila described as "A Buddhist monk is pulled off a motorcycle and burned alive by a Muslim mob." See <http://www.thereligionofpeace.com/attacks-2013.htm>. Accessed 1 December 2015. The site makes no mention of the at least forty-four other people who were killed, including the massacre of twenty-two Muslim children in a school (Physicians for Human Rights 2013).

21 For more in-depth criticisms of such media pieces, see Galache and Pedrosa (2015) and Wade (2015).

22 While the Burmese-language caption describes the demonstration as occurring in France, it is likely that at least some of the photos were taken in Australia. One placard reads, 'Refugees suck Aust dry'.

23 See also Wells, this volume, for a discussion of the way Western diplomats and aid workers responded to this interview.

24 Near the end of colonial rule, immigrants from elsewhere in British India were demographically and economically dominant: fifty-five per cent of total corporate taxes were paid by Indians, compared to just eleven per cent by Burmese. In the 1931 census, meanwhile, Indians made up more than fifty per cent of the Rangoon population (Burma Government 1939b, p. 17).

25 Woman, 34, Christian, Karen, Mawlamyine, March 2015.

26 Man, 20, Buddhist, Myanmar, Pathein February 2015.

27 "Forgetting extermination is part of extermination, because it is also the extermination of memory, of history, of the social, etc. This forgetting is as essential as the event." (Baudrillard 1994, p. 49).