External support and motivation for the Myanmar government to ensure rights for all people living in the borderlands

It is in the best interests of Myanmar that its citizens' rights are protected, including those of the Rohingya. While the Myanmar government needs to take the lead on this issue, other influential governments, INGOs, and the international community as a whole should also continue pursuing and motivating it towards sincere implementation. Countries like Malaysia and Indonesia should consider using the regional forum of Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) to put pressure on Myanmar (Malaysia is the current chair, having taken over last year from no other than Myanmar).[15] The Rohingya people should be granted full citizenship and their refugees should be brought back home, and the rights of other ethnic minorities of Myanmar should also be equally protected. Looking at the Rohingya struggles at home and at the amount of outside support they are able to garner, it may be a befitting time for the Myanmar government to assist the community in achieving their democratic rights and rehabilitation, an exercise where they may seek appropriate support from donors and the international community.

Review of the 'Rakhine Action Plan' and scrutiny of ongoing military operations

The Rakhine Action Plan as well as other government decrees and legislation that targets the Rohingya should be rescinded with immediate effect. Proactive and precautionary measures need to be taken to monitor and curb excesses by the Burmese military and security agents along the border, especially against civilians.

Need for more cross-border cooperation beyond the work of government

Bangladesh has a big market and a middle class increasingly engaged in business and trade exchanges that is very much open to cooperating with Myanmar. The planned deep-sea port for Bangladesh at Sonadia is likely to grow into a communications hub which could provide Myanmar and other neighbouring countries with many gains. In the case of Myanmar,