3 Chakrabarty talks of this mode of relating to others as ethical rather than political, although he acknowledges that these practices are "never completely autonomous of the larger political field" (2002, p. 144) here designated as politics. Nevertheless, the practices of proximity at the interpersonal level of which he speaks resonate with the conception of the political I argue for in this chapter.
4 Here my discussion is limited to physical violence. For a discussion of violence in Myanmar along both its physical (or personal) and structural dimensions, see Cheesman (2014a).
5 Only three of the 664 members of the first Naypyitaw legislature were Muslims (Chit Win 2016).
6 As Kyaw Min (2015) discussed at the 2015 Myanmar Update conference, podcast available online at: <http://asiapacific.anu.edu.au/news-events/podcasts/address-u-kyaw-min>. See also chapter in this volume by Helal Mohammed Khan (2016).
7 However, just one in a hundred respondents to the ABS survey were Muslim, a disproportionately low number that Welsh and Huang (2016) explain was an unintended consequence of the random survey design.
8 Hence my abiding concern with the rule of law in Myanmar as a preeminently political ideal that rests on the idea of equality, in opposition to law and order, which as a matter of principle rejects equality (Cheesman 2014b, 2015a, p. 262).
