Notes

I wish to thank Nick Cheesman, Gerry van Klinken, Allen Hicken, and Min Zin who provided me with insightful comments on drafts of this chapter, and Ian Holliday for his valuable suggestions on my presentation prepared for the 2015 Myanmar Update conference at the ANU.

This article is a part of larger project in which I intend to address "why did quasi-civilian government manage to pursue bold reform policies despite policy disengagement among ruling elites?" I want to express my gratitude to individuals who provided me the opportunity to meet them and share their valuable analyses about the ongoing peace process based on available information during my course of study. These key individuals include, but are not limited to, the Speaker of the Upper House, Khin Aung Myint; Ministers for the President's Office, Soe Thane, Aung Min, and Tin Naing Thein; the late Union Auditor General, Thein Htike; Deputy Minister for Information Ye Htut (subsequently Minister for Information); Deputy Minister for Social Welfare, Relief and Resettlement, Phone Swe; the former Attorney General, Aye Maung; Deputy Attorney General Tun Tun Oo; retired minister Aung Kyi; Sumlut Gun Maw from the KIO; the president's political advisor Ko Ko Hlaing; Lower House lawmakers Thura Aung Ko, Dwe Bu, Hkyet Hting Nan, and Saw Tun Mya Aung; Directors of the MPC, Hla Maung Shwe, Dr Min Zaw Oo, and Dr Salai Ngun Cung Lian; Directors of the President's Office, Zaw Htay and Htet Aung; the International Labour Organization's liaison officer in Myanmar, Steve Marshall; International Crisis Group consultant Richard Horsey; and journalists, including executive editor of Daily Eleven Nay Tun Naing, freelancer Sai Aung Tun Lwin, and stringer for the New York Times Wai Moe.

1 There are two possible limitations to the chapter: (i) confirmation bias in relation to other stakeholders' strategies; and (ii) cherry-picking risk on case selection. Firstly, if it is true that the peace technical team had resolved its problems largely by taking into account how each group of policy actors would respond, then we must accept that both the Tatmadaw and EAGs have been equally strategic in their actions towards the peace process. There may have been other factors influencing the strategic choices made by the Tatmadaw and the EAGs with regard to whether or not to keep up with the process. Secondly, the chapter is confined to the study of two very difficult cases of the vision and practice of the peace process, omitting from consideration other important cases relating to the piecemeal approach followed by the MPC. Omitted cases may have yielded different results. Further research is needed to address both possible limitations, and therefore the findings presented here are provisional.
