A report on the status of women living in seventeen IDP camps shows that the major overriding concern noted by women was women's and girl's heightened risk of suffering violence within their community due to the poor design of the camps. In particular, water, sanitation, and hygiene facilities and sleeping areas were identified as key areas of security concern. The types of violence identified by the women and girls interviewed for the report included rape, sexual harassment, domestic violence, and forced marriage (Gender Equality Network 2013b). Worryingly, the report noted an absence of justice mechanisms available for women living within the camps:

> At some camps, men from the camps are given responsibility for security. Sometimes, those men entered women's rooms making security as a reason and they slept there. Though women would like to report these cases, they cannot, as the camp administration people are men too.[16]

As this quote suggests, without women represented on camp committees, perpetrators of gender-based violence are neither identified nor punished. This creates a climate of impunity for such crimes, where the woman is typically blamed for the violence she experiences:

> The men said that wives are the only reason and the source of the family problems because they do not behave well. That they should understand well about the situation of men serving the country by putting their lives at risk, that women are guilty.[17]

In addition to the security concerns experienced by women in the camps, women face security threats linked to their gendered role and socio-economic position outside the camp areas. For instance, women and men may be given the same rations of water and food in the camps, but because of gender-based expectations women are responsible for the welfare of extended families and frequently leave the camps to seek resources. However, in leaving the camps they are put at risk of being attacked by soldiers, or stepping on landmines (Htoi Gender and Development Foundation 2014).

The lack of income in the IDP camps and other conflict-affected communities causes women to cross the border to neighbouring China to find work, exposing them to exploitation by traffickers involved in the war economy. Reports by local women's groups have found an increase of trafficking in women to China as brides or bonded labourers (KWAT 2011, 2013b). This increase in trafficking is closely linked to women's
